To Intending Immigrant Who Could Not Show Ten Dollars Cash.

A peculiar case illustrating what takes place sometimes at the frontier is said to have occurred on Friday last. A man from Wales, who had resided in Canada a year and a half, wanted to go to Scranton, Pa., to work in the coal mines there. He was stopped at Buffalo and put through a medical examination to determine his physical fitness to enter the United States, for which examination he was charged the fee of $2. This was all the money he had except a few cents, in addition to the first-class railway ticket with which he had been provided. He was then questioned as to the amount of money he had, and, having been previously "put wise" by others in the same car, he replied, "Ten dollars," the American law requiring that no one with less than that sum in cash shall be admitted. The official demanded that he produce the money, but he could show only two cents, whereupon he was turned back, and, it is stated, was refused the refund of the $2 he had paid for the examination.
